This agreeable but predictable story counsels that true friendship is rare and that readers should accept their pals' idiosyncrasies. Prim brown mouse Mildred is a close companion of nerdy brown mouse Ed, whose too-short pants and round glasses make him an Erckel among rodents. Ed's button collection seems weird to Mildred, but "no one could hold a candle to Ed's homemade, fudge-frosted, triple-layer cake. Or make Mildred laugh so hard her eyes would water." Unfortunately, a rift develops when Ed takes up poetry. He rhymes at all timesAat the dentist, at the library, at the supermarketAand the embarrassed Mildred seeks out a new best friend in a self-absorbed ice-skater. Wagner (Silly Fred) and Pedersen (A Weed Is a Seed) stick to convention in the text and watercolors. Wagner shows how badly Mildred and Ed miss one another when they're apart, and Pedersen draws the duo as gawky, bipedal mice who look like skinny humans but for their egg-shaped heads, donutlike ears and simian tails. Ed's nice, but utterly unsurprising. Ages 5-8.

PreSchool-Grade 2-A pleasant friendship tale. When Ed starts reciting poems in odd places, including the library and the supermarket, Mildred's embarrassment leads her to seek a new playmate. She finds one in Pearl, a self-centered ice-skating expert. As winter passes, Ed continues his usual activities, which include cake baking and button sorting, but he longs to have his old friend back. Meanwhile, Mildred is getting fed up with Pearl's antics and decides to make up with Ed. She discovers him awkwardly writing her name with ice skates and realizes he still wants to be friends. In return, she gives him a pen, the perfect gift for a poet. These mice don't quite match the charm of Kevin Henkes's creations, but the lively watercolor illustrations convey quite a bit of personality. Ed's long limbs and goofy glasses make him seem properly mouselike and boyish at the same time, and Mildred's changing emotions show in the subtle expressions in her eyes and mouth. Though the plot is nothing unusual, it works well, with the message of accepting eccentricities coming through gently and effectively. The pair's reconciliation is convincing. Mildred never actually shows that she can handle Ed's outbursts in public, but it's clear enough that the mouse has learned her lesson and will stick with her friend no matter how strangely he acts.

Ages 4⁺-6. Rodents Mildred and Ed are opposites: Mildred is demure, and Ed is boisterous. But they are friends nonetheless, until Ed becomes overly enthusiastic about poetry class and embarrasses Mildred by reciting in the supermarket. Mildred decides, then and there, that she needs a less flamboyant buddy. She finds Pearl, only to realize that her new friend is prissy, bossy, and not nearly as much fun as her old pal. It isn't long before Mildred and Ed have a sweet reconciliation, which comes with the understanding that despite their differences, they bring out the best in each other. The text is a bit disjointed at times, but poetry lovers will revel in the spirited rhymes Ed spouts, and everyone will warm to Pedersen's charming pictures.

Cute book with a great message

By L. Friedman

Recently I asked a girl in the third grade class where I am student teaching to recommend me a book. She chose a Friend Like Ed because she liked the story, but she said she liked the poetry in the book even better. The story itself is relatable for anybody of any age. We've all been embarrassed by a wacky friend (or family member) and wished to free ourselves from any association with that person. In this book, Mildred is embarrassed by her best friend Ed who can recite poetry anywhere he goes and seems to have an infinite amount of odd collections. Mildred grows tired of being embarrassed by Ed and decides to become friends with a girl named Pearl that seemed normal in everyway. However, Pearl does not prove to be as good a friend as Ed was and Mildred begins to miss Ed and his oddities. The message of the book is to embrace our quirks and to accept those who are genuine and it comes through nicely in the book.

Cute book about friendship and accepting differences.

By A Customer

A friend lent me this book and it brightened my day! What an important idea to share with kids: the idea that we need to accept each other for what we ARE and not what we want the other person to be. This book effectively teaches us about what to look for in a friend. It reminded me a bit of some of the qualities of Marc Brown's "Arthur" books, as well as Kevin Henkes' work. Very enjoyable; great illustrations.
