1930's Small Town Spinster Leads an Interesting Life

By kb1

The story of two sisters is told completely through their letters and Clara's diary entries. Nora leaves the small Canadian town to live in New York and lands a job as a radio soap opera actress in the 1930's. Clara remains in the small town teaching at the school where her father was principal before his death. Clara finds a radio, phone and car unnecessary. After an incident on the back roads of the small town, Clara seeks out the help of Nora in New York. After returning to Canada, Clara occasionally treats herself to a movie in a larger city. It is there that she meets a man that changes her future.

At first I felt sorry for Clara and was sure that ditzy Nora was headed for big trouble. Although Nora had her share of man troubles, it was nothing compared to the troubles of her spinster sister, Clara. I kept hoping Clara would soften or wizen but the afterward leads the reader to believe that did not happen.

Good read!

By MarW

I really enjoyed this story of two sisters from a small town in Ontario, told through a combination of their correspondence and Clara's diary. The story takes place mainly in the 1930s and is a good reflection of the challenges faced by single women during that time. One sister goes to New York and becomes a popular radio soap opera star, while the other remains a schoolteacher in her small town in Canada.

The story reads as though it was written by a woman, but surprisingly, the author is a man, who did a commendable job of conveying the lives of these two very different women.

Male author? Could of fooled me!

By Retired2009

This book is not in the genre I generally read but the number of 5 star reviews caught my eye. The nuances of character were such that I was completely taken aback when I discovered that the author was male - after I finished reading the book! Although an avid e-book purchaser and reader, I rarely take the time to rate a book - this book was exceptional and worth a few minutes of my time to comment publicly.
